SCENE 1 OF 20

A different Christmas sound

At home, Robin and Grandad were enjoying a cosy bedtime story. Robin liked drawing little maps, and sometimes hummed a little tune while thinking. Outside, snow softened every roof. Then came a tiny sound from the letterbox: not a letter falling, but a bell trying very hard to clear its throat.

SCENE 2 OF 20

The blue ribbon

On the mat lay a brass hand bell tied with a blue ribbon. Beside it was a golden paper star. A little white snow fox pressed its nose against the window. The fox’s scarf was much too long. “The square,” it whispered. “Before the last lantern lights.”

SCENE 3 OF 20

An invitation, not an order

Robin showed everything to Grandad. Together they went to the town square. The Christmas tree was dark. Its lights were magical lanterns, each waiting for a friendly bell note. “We can find out what happened,” said Grandad. The fox sneezed a perfect snowflake into its own scarf.

SCENE 4 OF 20

The bell keeper

In a little booth sat the new bell keeper, Wren. Wren had practised every morning. But yesterday, one note had squeaked and someone had laughed. Now Wren’s hands trembled. “I’d rather the bell stayed quiet,” Wren whispered, looking at the empty square.

SCENE 5 OF 20

A loud first try

The fox took a huge breath and shouted the festival tune. Nothing happened, except that snow slid off its hat. Robin tried ringing the hand bell very loudly. One lantern blinked, then went dark again. “Louder isn’t the same as right,” said Grandad.

SCENE 6 OF 20

A clue round the rim

Robin noticed three little marks around the bell: a dot, another dot and a long line. A tiny drawing beneath them showed a door opening. “Not a secret password,” Robin said. “Maybe a way to say hello.” The fox knocked its tail against the booth: tap, tap, swoosh.

SCENE 7 OF 20

Something from home

A familiar tune could turn separate sounds into a pattern. Robin tried two short notes and one long one. A small lantern above the postbox lit up. Wren looked through the booth window. The sound had been gentle enough to listen to, and simple enough to remember.

SCENE 8 OF 20

One lantern is not a festival

They repeated the pattern. The same little lantern glowed more brightly, but the tree stayed dark. Robin looked at the golden star. Around its edge were tiny drawings: a mitten, a cup, a scarf and an open window. The bell’s puzzle was not finished yet.

SCENE 9 OF 20

The closed window

Across the square, a neighbour watched from a window. “I don’t know the tune,” the neighbour said. Wren pulled back into the booth. “Neither do I, properly.” Robin remembered Grandad often said that one small try was enough to begin. Perhaps the next thing to collect was not a better note.

SCENE 10 OF 20

A paper invitation

Robin folded the golden star into a little invitation. “You only need one sound,” Robin called. “We can make the tune together.” The neighbour tapped a cup with a spoon. It made a wonderfully wobbly ting. The fox bowed as if meeting a very important orchestra.

SCENE 11 OF 20

The mitten rhythm

At the next doorway, two children could clap their woolly mittens. At another, a grandparent could hum. A baker could tap a wooden spoon on a cool empty bowl. Nobody had to buy a present or sing a solo. The square slowly filled with different small sounds.

SCENE 12 OF 20

A gap in the tune

They tried the pattern again: two short sounds, one long. The low lanterns lit up. The high ones waited. Between the first taps and the last hum was a small empty beat. “That’s my turn,” Wren said, almost too softly to hear.

SCENE 13 OF 20

The offer

Robin held out the blue-ribbon bell. “Would you like me to ring with you?” Wren thought for a long time. “Not in front of everyone.” So Grandad asked the neighbours to practise their own sounds while Robin and Wren tried one quiet note behind the booth.

SCENE 14 OF 20

The squeak returns

The note squeaked. Wren went very still. The fox’s ears pointed in different directions. “Mine does that too,” said Robin. Robin tried once more, slowly. This note was rounder. The first sound had not vanished; it had become part of learning the second.

SCENE 15 OF 20

A smaller promise

“We can start with just the two of us,” Robin said. “And we can stop if you need to.” Wren nodded. The little explorer listened for a beat, then quietly matched it. They found a comfortable pace. Wren did not stop feeling nervous. There was simply room to ring while feeling nervous.

SCENE 16 OF 20

Everyone’s little part

They returned to the square. The mittens gave two soft taps. The cup added its wobbly ting. Robin and Wren rang the missing note together. The neighbours hummed the long sound. Warm gold climbed the tree, lantern by lantern, until even the top branch shone.

SCENE 17 OF 20

The star has a job

The fox sprang towards the star, tripped on its long scarf and sat neatly inside a snowdrift. Everyone laughed kindly, including Wren. Robin handed the unfolded paper star to the grown-up who decorated the low branches. Now the invitation belonged on the tree.

SCENE 18 OF 20

A Christmas worth keeping

There were no perfect singers in the square. There were tired voices, excited voices and one fox with snow in its scarf. Wren rang one note alone, then asked Robin to join the next. The tree had room for both sounds.

SCENE 19 OF 20

The walk home

Walking home with Grandad, Robin hummed the pattern under the falling snow. There would be a new page to draw together after their next bedtime story. The bell was staying with Wren, but its blue ribbon had a loose end. Wren had tied that little piece around Robin’s paper star badge.

SCENE 20 OF 20

The first note next year

On Christmas morning, Robin set the badge beside a favourite cup. The fox had left one final pawprint on the windowsill. Beneath it was a tiny drawing of an open door. Next year’s festival, Robin decided, could begin with an invitation.

Questions worth talking about

1. Why did Wren want the bell to stay quiet? What helped without making the worry magically disappear?

2. Which clues showed that many small sounds were needed?

3. What did the neighbours contribute without buying anything?

4. Who could you invite into a shared activity, and how could you make the first turn smaller?

Read it again, differently

Find the bell’s three marks, the drawings on the star and the little empty beat. How does each clue become an invitation?

Three words to take away

rhythm

A pattern of sounds and pauses.

invitation

A friendly offer to join something; a person can choose whether to accept.

reassure

To help someone feel less worried, without pretending a hard thing is easy.

The Christmas greeting rhythm

Make two quiet taps and a long hum. Leave a pause. Ask someone to answer with the same pattern. Now give each person only one part: who listens for the gap?

Answer & explanation

One person can make the first tap, another the second, and another the hum. A shared pause helps everyone start together. There is no single required sound or singing ability.

Make an invitation star

10–15 minutes · Paper and pencils; a grown-up can help with cutting.

1. Draw a large paper star and decorate it with three things you like doing with someone.

2. Write or draw one small activity you would like to share.

3. Offer the invitation without insisting on a yes. Decide together how to begin.

For the grown-up: Use quiet sounds and paper crafts. A grown-up handles scissors; do not use candles, hot appliances or electrical decorations.

Story & reality: The lanterns respond to a magic bell in this fictional story. Real Christmas lights and electrical equipment are for grown-ups to handle.
